This course deals with the art form of movies--looking at the images of women in a wide range of movies, including Disney films, action films, romantic comedies, science fiction/horror and teen films. The course focuses on Hollywood films; it seeks to understand them by comparing within and among genres, as well as across cultures and time periods. Popular films like those studied here are one of the most powerful ways to depict American culture. Further, the course introduces students to the tools of cultural studies in order to analyze ideas of gender, specifically femininity, in mainstream U.S. society by exploring assumptions embedded in media sources.

This course addresses the question "What is Women's Studies?" by looking at changing definitions of women and men. We will examine the construction of gender and biological sex across nations and cultures, within academic disciplines and in popular media. We will explore women's issues in the U.S. and internationally, paying particular attention to how race, sexuality, class, and other factors create differences among groups of women. We will take a renewed look at the world around us, examining the ways in which power and privilege, societal ideas, and ignorance have contributed to what we think we know. We will also examine ways in which we can work individually and together to promote social change and growth in an effort to advance the equality of all people.
